Getting snail mail is one of my favorite indulgences, and I think receiving mail is actually a common joy.

I love the rebelliousness of snail mail, and I love anything that can arrive with a postage stamp. There's something about that person's breath and hands on the letter.

~Diane Lane

And none will hear the postman's knock
Without a quickening of the heart.
For who can bear to feel himself forgotten?

Sending a handwritten letter is becoming such an anomaly. It's disappearing. My mom is the only one who still writes me letters. And there's something visceral about opening a letter - I see her on the page. I see her in her handwriting. ~ Steve Carrell

“According to the Royal Mail, 72 per cent of people who celebrate Christmas would prefer to receive a printed card. There’s something comforting about seeing familiar handwriting scrawled across an envelope, heartening to see new names added to the greeting inside, poignant when some names are no longer there. “

~Deborah Robertson “Christmas Cards are Dying” in the Telegraph
